Two, however, have been dominant: (1) He has for many years been concerned with a study of the vertebrate life of the period here discussed and has, as a preliminary to more extensive work, recorded the results of his work on the morphology and surroundings of that form of life in the publications of the Carnegie Institution of Washington and elsewhere. This work, dealing more fully with the conditions under which certain groups had their inception, development, and decadence is a direct outcome of the previous work, and, it is hoped, the first of a series which shall embrace a discussion of this period of time wherever its records occur. (2) As the author has carried his work to the broader questions which have developed he has become increasingly aware of the lack of agreement as to the content of paleogeography and the method of procedure in solving the various problems which arise. This publication has become, in consequence, in part an attempt to crystallize in some measure our ideas of the meaning and methods of paleogeography. The chapter upon the elements of a paleogeographic problem is an effort to set forth in orderly form the principles upon which such work should be concluded and the matter that should be treated. It is the result of the direct question which the author put to himself: What are the things that I should keep in...
